Halfway House
Finzel
Private

House: ca. 1880
Barn: 1890

The location of this dwelling on the National Road midway between Frostburg and Grantsville gave this site its nickname "Halfway House." It is a frame, two story, T-plan building with a cross gable roof, typical of many rural dwellings in the area dating from the late nineteenth century. This building is a good example of this house type since it retains its original weatherboard siding, fishscale shingle trim, and ornate window surrounds. It is situated on a farm that also includes an 1890 frame bank barn and several late nineteenth to early twentieth century outbuildings.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Halfway House is a frame, two story, T-plan building with a cross gable roof. It is situated on a farm, that also includes an 1890 frame bank barn and several late nineteenth to early twentieth century outbuildings.

The house rests on a coursed, roughly squared stone foundation and measures three bays wide by one bay deep with a two bay by one bay rear wing. Its facade has a symmetrical three bay center door arrangement with a central cross gable and a remodeled hip-roofed porch that shelters the three bays but does not extend the full length of the facade. A shed-roofed porch supported by turned posts shelters the rear of the main block and continues around to the east side of the rear wing, terminating in a small enclosure. All first and second windows are 1/1 sash; additionally, each of the three gables in the main block is pierced by a small rectangular window. The transom topped facade door and all of the windows are trimmed with plain board surrounds and ornate cornices that consist of a heavy molding and a scalloped border supported by two small scroll brackets. The louvered shutters flanking each window are a recent addition. Weatherboard with cornerboards sheathes the exterior walls on all surfaces except the facade cross gable which is covered with fishscale shingles. Large diamond-shaped asphalt shingles cover the roof. A box cornice with partial gable end returns and a plain board frieze surrounds the eaves on the main block; the rafter ends on the rear wing are enclosed without being boxed. The house has two interior brick chimneys: one on the ridgeline of the rear wing, and the other on the north side of the ridgeline on the main block. Alterations to the building include the installation of a picture window on the first floor western bay of the facade and a set of sliding glass doors on the east elevation of the rear wing.

The barn, which is located on the south side of U. S. Route 40, has a datestone set in the northeast side of its stone foundation that reads: T. H. L. 1890, June 3. The hewn sills are half-lapped at the corners and its circular sawn frame is mortise and tenoned together. Asphalt siding over the original vertical board sheathing alters the barn's appearance, as does the glazed brick silo that was added to the northeast elevation.

Two frame machine sheds sit on the south side of U. S. Route 40 across from the house. Three small frame outbuildings are located behind the house.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The location of this dwelling on the National road midway between Frostburg and Grantsville gave this site its nickname "Halfway House." The deed actually refers to the building as "Halfway House," it being previously owned by George Layman who bought the property in 1877.¹ In his History of Western Maryland, J. Thomas Scharf mentions "Layman's Half-way House" as a point of reference in describing the area.² By virtue of its location on this heavily traveled road, Halfway House seems to have become a landmark.

Thomas H. Layman acquired the property from his father in 1886. They are most likely his initials on the barn datestone since he owned the land in 1890.

The house itself is representative of the type of dwelling that was most popular in Garrett County from the late nineteenth through early twentieth centuries. The majority of houses built in rural areas during this period follow this two story, three bay by one bay form with rear wing. This house is a particularly good example because its original siding and trim are still intact.
